Understanding Race and Racism Today: A Conversation with Cristina Mora

Race remains a salient category in contemporary life and politics, and various manifestations of racism continue to plague efforts to forge a more just society. Yet, even among well-educated and politically progressive people, it is not always easy to fully grasp the meaning of race and as well as how taken-for-granted racial distinctions perpetuate socio-political inequality, economic disparity and even violence. Jerome Baggett will engage Prof. Mora in a conversation to clarify such matters and help us to understand racial dynamics more clearly.

An Advent Moment of Reflection through Art - facilitated by Kate Barush, Anh Tran, SJ, and Kevin O'Brien, SJ

We invite JST students, faculty and staff to a conversation on the representation of race in historic and contemporary portrayals of Jesus Christ and the Virgin Mary. Please find an image that you find compelling, prayerful, problematic, moving (or any combination of the above) to introduce and discuss in a casual seminar format. The image can be two or three dimensional; from a museum, church, book, website, film, billboard, or anywhere else. Topics of discussion may include (but are not limited to) art as a reflection of culture, as a powerful tool of social discourse and/or change, and broader issues of representation(s) and the Catholic/religious imagination.

Please send your image to Prof. Barush by Friday, December 2 so she can arrange the projection of images.

Religion and Culture Lecture Series: Legal Landscapes and Contracting Worlds in James Welch's Fools Crow

By Beth Piatote, Associate Professor of Native American Studies, UC Berkeley

Published in 1986, Welch's historical novel is set in Montana in the late nineteenth century, and deals significantly with U.S. military and settler encroachment on Pikuni (Blackfeet) lands and communities. This lecture tracks representations of visual practices, particularly dreaming, in opening up alternative spaces where Pikuni individuals can traverse and negotiate various contractual agreements with spiritual and/or non-human powers.
